"This illusion was first demonstrated by Diana Deutsch at the University of California, San Diego. Building on the stereo effect described above, the recording features overlapping sequences of repeating words or phrases, located in different regions of stereo space. As you listen to it, you'll start to pick out specific phrases. However, none of the phrases are really there. Your brain is constructing them, in a bid to make sense of a meaningless noise. Indeed, you may find that the phrases you hear are related to what's on your mind - for example, people who are dieting often hear phrases associated with food." --from <http://www.newscientist.com/article/...lusions-.html>

Pretty intense. You can really screw with people's heads with this stuff. Makes me wonder if this has anything to do with all the 'backwards recorded messages' I know some were engineered, but quite possibly some of them are completely by chance and our brains just pick out the messages we hope to hear. This happens with visual stuff to, we try and make sense out of chaos, hence people seeing faces in their every day breakfast, pieces of wood, toenails... etc.. etc..

^ Yes, the brain tries to make sense out of stimuli it's exposed to. You receive clues and your brain pieces them together to form a reality you can accept. What's freaky is being alone in the deep forest and hearing a sound you have never heard before. You have no reference and nothing to associate it with.

My impressions of the sounds:

1. road ray
2. count down
3. blank blank

A big part of what makes them "salviaesque" to me is that if I listen to them for the full duration of the audio files, the imaginary words/phrases gradually transform as my mind wanders, so what I hear at first is completely different from what I hear at the end or in the middle.

Those who die before they die do not die when they die.
